1. Profile: Spoon Fed Soup Delivers

After working for many years as a chef in the demanding, yet low paying food industry, Carmie needed a change that was right for her. She noticed that soup seemed to always sell well and that not many businesses were making and delivering soup. Carmie got ten friends to test out her soups. Not only did her friends love the soups, they told all their friends how delicious they were.

Though it was a challenge, Carmie became self employed and found a commercial kitchen to make her soups in. In the three years that Spoon Fed Soup has been in existence, Carmie has made 60 different types of soups. Each week Spoon Fed Soup makes three types of gourmet soups. She loves making lentil and legume soups. Currently the curry bread lentil is her customer's favourite.

All the soups are made from scratch with natural ingredients. Ninety percent of the produce and meats are organic. Carmie personally eats organic food, so creating organic soups was natural. Plus she says organic tastes better.

Many of her customers want to know where the ingredients come from. Carmie buys most of her ingredients from local farmers, whom she was introduced to by friends. Most of the soups are seasonal. In the winter time Carmie uses ingredients she previously canned.

Spoon Fed Soup delivers the soups directly to customers on Sundays and Mondays. This way only 2 trips are made in two small vehicles, instead of a 100 vehicles coming individually to Spoon Fed Soup. Also inline with Carmie's values of reducing her eco-footprint, Spoon Fed Soups currently just delivers within the inner city. To accommodate those who live in the suburbs, Carmie delivers to people who work in offices downtown. The soups just need to be reheated and are ready to eat.

The soups are sold in one litre glass jars, which requires a deposit of $1. Soups cost $12 including the deposit for the glass jar. Spoon Fed Soup accepts 100% Calgary Dollars, which Carmie can spend in her neighbourhood at the Sunnyside Market grocery store. The jars are picked up as the next batch of soups are delivered so they can be reused. Carmie recycles and composts as much as possible. She also uses an environmentally safe cleaning product.

Right now Spoon Fed Soup is at maximum capacity selling 300 litres of soups each week. This is not nearly enough to keep up with the demand, built up from mostly word of mouth, but also articles in the Calgary Herald and the MacLean's magazine. With this, Carmie is planning on buying her own space and building her own kitchen in the near future. She will have to hire staff, but expects that it will not be difficult to hire and retain staff in Calgary's tight labour market because of the unique community and environmental aspects of her business.

Spoon Fed Soup is the new wave of business that is locally based, supported and is supported by the community, is environmentally driven, and is commercially successful.

3. Saskatchewan CED News

Saskatchewan Co-op Association Executive Director Resigns

After 7 years at the helm, Warren Crossman has announced his resignation as Executive Director of the Saskatchewan Co-operative Association (SCA), as of June 30, 2008. Warren has demonstrated his commitment to building a better world through co-operatives not only at SCA, but also with his previous work in the co-operative sector.

"The decision to resign was extremely difficult and not without a lot of soul searching over the last year. I will miss the relationships I've had with many people, their co-operatives and credit unions on a provincial/national scale. My passion for co-operatives has not diminished, in fact, it may still be increasing. Grassroots co-operative development and local community involvement are still very much on my mind for the future," says Warren.

Warren and his wife Cathy moved to the family farm, near Yorkton, about a year ago and plan to link their passions of horticulture, co-operatives and small scale farming. Those of us who worked with Warren, will sincerely miss all that he brought personally and professionally to SCA, and yet understand and appreciate his desire to meld his passions.

Warren's description of his new place in life simply says it all, "Treasures lie there in the fertile soil, the growing plants, the arching trees and the clean air. I find it easy to be attracted to the soil, living things and the spiritual nature of what God has blessed us with in abundance."

We wish Warren and Cathy well in their new and exciting endeavour.

Transforming or Reforming Capitalism

Towards a Theory of Community Economic Development

edited by John Loxley, Professor of Economics and Co-ordinator of Research, Global Political Economy Program, University of Manitoba

Worldwide interest in community economic development has grown rapidly in recent years. There has been a blossoming of “how to” manuals, as well as analyses of co-operatives, development corporations, gender and CED, financing CED, planning CED, government and CED, etc. Yet, with a few exceptions, in all this discussion very little is said about the basic objective of CED: is it designed to fill holes left by capitalism or is it intended to replace it? There is equally little on a theory of CED - its rationale, modus operandi, successes, failures, strengths, and weaknesses. This book draws on several disciplines – particularly economics, sociology, and political studies – to assess the state of CED theory and to identify implicit theoretical issues for building that theory.

Beyond the Farmers' Market by Sarah Hultine

The potential for community and economic development of local food systems and locally-grown food initiatives in Central Illinois

"The idea of developing local food systems is an attractive one, but the how to of developing local sources and markets for food is often a stumbling block. Even as consumers are shopping at farmers' markets, subscribing to community supported agriculture operations, dining at restaurants that buy locally, and developing new relationships with farmers, more would be better. This guide describes factors that contribute to the success or challenges of local food system projects." Read on
